John was so excited about his invention that he was gentle since childhood had looked (the young genius) up to his father, an engineer and inventor, who had more than one discovery in the field of biology under his belt. John's father was a scientist, botanist and traveler, he travelled around the world and discovered all kinds of plants and microorganisms yet unknown to the world. Such a serious scientist and not trust instruments and designed everything he needed in his discovering with his own hands, and so, John, at an earlier age than his father had already assembled his first microscope by the age of 16, the first thing he wanted was to show his father this little invention but unfortunately John had not seen his father since he was 8 years old and the only means of his communication was a one-sided letter from his father.
